

THE GAZETTE.

MONDAY EVENING, AUGUST 19.

A FREQUENT CAUSE OF CHILLS AND FEVER.—Dr. R. T. Trail says in the Phenological Journal, that intermittent fever is known to prevail (except in sporadic cases) only in districts where there is a large amount of vegetable matter in a state of decomposition, and this occurs more especially in times of drouth. In dry seasons, rotting wood and other vegetable, usually innocuous because under water, is exposed to the atmosphere, which it attains with the emanations of decay. We have no evidence that any amount of decaying vegetable matter on a dry soil, though it may be very unwholesome, is especially conducive to the intermittent form of fever. Moisture is an essential factor in the cause. But all swampy lands are more or less productive of this type of fever in dry seasons, and the prevalence of intermittents in their vicinities always corresponds with the quantity of decaying organic matter. Another source of the disease not so thought of, and seldom alluded to in medical books, is rotting wood and other decaying vegetable matter, in the cellars and dooryards of houses which are situated in damp places. If wood, or any other decaying vegetable matter, and water are allowed to accumulate in the immediate vicinity of houses or stables, the water will become stagnant, and the air will be generated, causing intermittent fever in the occupants of the houses, and more obscure, though analogous affection in the domestic animals. Many farmers wonder why the members of their families are sick, and how their domestic animals become diseased, when if they would only look at the stagnant water, decaying offal, and accumulated excrement in the immediate vicinity, they would find the explanation in an ever-present malarial atmosphere.
